ATLANTIC ICEBERGS LONG HAVE CARRIED DEATH TO MARINERS

Wreck Revives Titanic Frightful Story of the William Brown.

That wild stretch of the Atlantic to the eastward of Cape Race, off the Grand Banks of Newfoundland, has been the grave of many a stout ship in years past. The Titanic is but one of many that have gone down there. In those seasons of the year when the cebergs, broken away from the Arctic glaciers, float southward, there are few more dangerous waters in the world. That part of the ocean, if one will take a map and look at it, is directly in the track of the fields of ice that float southward from the polar regions about Greenland.

One of the most remarkable stories of the sea, which can be found anywhere is the story of the fate of the American sailing ship, William Brown, which went down in the same region as the Titanic back in 1841. It can be found in the dusty, worn, leather-covered law reports of the law library at the Capitol, instead of in the volumes of the romancers and writers of tales of the imagination. Litigation resulted from the going down of the ship and a prosecution for murder, and the rea prosecution for murder, and the result was that there was put into enduring court records a tale of suffering and marine tragedy as grim as any of the tales that have been borne of the recent disaster to the great White Star liner.

Curlously enough, the circumstances of the sinking of the Wiliam Brown were in many respects parallel to those of the Titanic. Moreover, the case gave rise to rulings on law points that are just now of more than passing interest to the legal profession.

Thrown Overheard

"It was just one long grand thrill"

Thrown Overboard.

The story of the Titanic disaster does not disclose that anybody was actually cause of equal rights," said Mrs. Ellen thrown overboard to save the lives of others, though many were left to their lawyer, educator, and suffragist, today fate with a calm calculation that was in telling how a woman feels while little less heartless. In the case of walking in a suffragette parade. Mrs. the William Brown, passengers were Mussey was one of the Washington actually thrown overboard in order delegation of woman suffrage enthuthat some of the crew and other pas- slasts who marched with the 16,000 sengers might be saved.

The William Brown left Liverpool held in New York Saturday, March 13, 1841, bound for Philadelphia. "I started out with the ma She carried a heavy cargo, a crew of tending to go three or four o'clock the night of April 19, only four days later in the month than the Titanic struck. Then, about 250 miles southeast of Cape Race, the vessel struck an iceberg, and began to fill so rapidly that it was seen she was going down. It will be seen that the accident

When it was seen the vessel would sink, the only two boats on board, the long boat and the jolly boat, were cleared away and lowered. The lack of enough lifeboats was emphasized in this case, as it has been later, though it man of powerful physeaman and a man of powerful physique named Holmes. Thirty-one passengers remained on board, or rather were compelled to stay there, and went down with the ship. The vessel sank in an hour and a half after striking the iceberg and every person not in the two boats was lost.

Boats Long At Sea.

Before the long boat and the jolly boat parted the captain ordered the members of the crew in the long boat to obey the orders of the first mate as if they were his own. Then the two boats separated. The jolly boat was at sea six days and, with the captain and others in it, was finally picked up by a French fishing lugger.

The trials of the people in the long beat were more tragic. This craft had not been in the water since the ship left Liverpool and as soon as launched began to leak. The water had to be baied out with buckets and tins and various devices were resorted to to keep it from being swamped. At first the weather was calm enough. Monday and weather was calm enough. Monday and Monday night the craft got along fairly well. But the next day, with cold rains and heavy seas, the boat seemed to be in great jeopardy. The people were half naked, were crowded together like sheep, they suffered intensely from the cold, and many of them were half-benumbed from the exposure and more or less helpless.

numbed from the exposure and more or less helpless.
Holmes, first, mate, had warned the captain when they parted that unless the jolly boat took some of the passengers in the long boat it would be necessary "to cast lots and throw some overboard." But the captain took over no-sary "to cast lots and throw some overboard." But the captain took over nobody.

Tuesday night, when the sea was heavy, and the situation looked bad for the long boat, Holmes and the crew threw a number of the male passengers and two women overboard. Holmes gave the order and helped in the ghastly work. Piteous pleas went up to be spared and for delay, even to be allowed to draw lots. But Holmes was inexorable. Speaking scarcely a word. Holmes and the sailors went to the work and the benumbed and exhausted victims went down over the side. Not one of the crew was thrown over. One of the crew was thrown over. One of the crew was thrown expenses. Altogether, fourteen men and two women were thus thrown into the sea. Two of the victims were sacrificed Wednesday morning. They were men, stiff with cold, who had hidden themselves on board the long boat. One of the men thrown over was Francis Askin, a passenger. He begged Holmes to spare him, saying:

"If God don't send us help, we'll draw" is to find the long boat of the captain, saying:
"If God don't send us help, we'll draw" in the captain to the London Times by Lord Charles Beresford, admiral of the Britsh navy, and reproduced in the Charles Beresford, admiral of the Britsh navy, and reproduced in the current issue of Engineering, a London publication.

Lord Beresford grants the bravery and chivairy of Captain Smith, the officers, seamen, band, and passengers of the Titanic. In his letter, however, he describes the work of the men below the engineers and their forces. The letter says in part:

"Nothing can exceed the heroism of the captain, officers, and seamen are the ship, but officers and seamen are the first to offer a whole-hearted tribute of unbounded admiration to those working below, as they well know how often the grit and courage of the officers and upon in moments of emergency. It is stated that the lights were burning until a few minutes before she took her final pung.

This proves that the conditions.

like a men."

He offered Holmes five sovereigns.
"I don't want your money. Frank."
said Holmes, and then, after a struggle.

said Holmes, and then, after a struggle, threw Askin overboard.

Wednesday, the long boat was picked up by the ship Crescent. Had Holmes and the crew waited ten or twelve hours, none of the passengers would have been sacrificed.

have been sacrificed.

Eventually, the survivors were brought to land. Askin had friends in Philadelphia. Holmes was arrested and tried for manslaughter, and there was a long, and highly interesting trial before Justice Baldwin, in Philadelphia, in the Federal court of the third circuit. Able lawyers appeared on both sides. One would have suposed that Holmes would have been severely punished. Actually, he got off with six months hard labor and a fine of $20.

His Defermines would to be passengers would be previously and the previous day. Only one year ago President Diaz of Mexico announced his intention to resign. Thirty-nine years ago today Salmon P. Chase, chief justice of the Supreme Court of the United States.

the long boat was saved at all. It was his eye that first descried a sail when the Crescent hove near. Before the vessel sank, he had done valuable work. widowed Scotswoman and three daughters were on board. One was sick. At the risk of his life, Holmes daughters were on board. One was sick. At the risk of his life, Holmes rescued this sick woman at the last minute, before the William Brown went down, and carried her to safety in the long boat. And there was much conflict of testimony as to the extent of the jeopardy in which the long boat was piaced. The captain, who testified at the trial, gave Holmes a high character, and it was brought out that when Holmes, on parting from the captain when the jolly boat and the long boat separated, hinted that it might be necessary to throw some overboard, the captain practically sanctioned it. It was also brought out that Holmes had said Tuesday night that if relief did not come Wednesday, after some had been thrown over, they would draw lots and go overboard in that fashion.

The merciless manner in which the crew saved themselves at the expense of passengers came in for a scoring by Judge Baldwin, though it was taken out in words rather than a heavy sentence on Holmes. In the course of an opinion that will doubtless be widely perused in the litigation arising from the loss of the Titanic, he said:

"The sailor is bound to undergo whatever hazard is necessary to preserve the boat and passengers."

boat and passengers."
And again: "The passenger cannot be bound to sacrifice his life to preserve the sallor's. Many other interesting matters were touched on by the court. Senate law-yers have been reading up on the case, among others, since the Titanic sank.

NEW YORK PARADE, TELLS OF THRILLS

"It was just one long grand thrill that held all of us in its spell with the realization that we were working for the Spencer Mussey, the prominent woman women in the great suffrage pageant

"I started out with the marchers tending to go three or four squares, seventeen and sixty-five passengers. The passengers were mainly Ecotch and but instead marched the entire twenty-lrish emigrants. All went well until 10 three squares, and was prepared to march again," said Mrs. Mussey. year ago I could not see the good that a parade could do in the cause of equal rights for women, but this time my eyes have been opened.

woman suffrage. "The sight of Mrs. Belmont and other women of wealth, of aged and promi-nent women philanthropists, lawyers, doctors, and others in the pageant, all of whom felt the same spirit that thrilled and stirred enthusiasm in the breast of many women who looked on and hundreds of men who had heretofore scoffed at suffrage for women.

"There we were, 16,000 educated, conscientious women, trying to break into human society in order to share its burdens and shape its policy. We didn't plead, we made no violent demonstrations; we merely marched with the one thought of impressing the multitude and the country at large that we are fighting in a just cause."
